School Drop-Outs Concern Of All Personnel Manager Tells P-TA

Those who fail their first big challenge — to finish high school — may also fail in company training programs and other challenges, a personnel manager for General Electric told the Appomattox High P-TA last week.

School Drop-Outs usually stay in the community, also, said F. John Schoeneck, and are one of the causes of high welfare payment costs and delinquency. Schoeneck showed a film, "School Drop - Outs", and then listed for the P-TA some of the qualities his company looks for in prospective employees.

"We're looking, first, for persons with experience — and then those who are trainable." He said G. E. has found that persons completing high school are more apt to be satisfactory trainees.

Automation takes a toll of the "underskilled, under-educated," Schoeneck said. In one changeover to more complicated machinery at G.E., a large number of the workers had to be taught how to use a simple tool rubric. "And some of our workers were not able to do that," he said. School Dropouts to quote a much used phrase, are the "last ones hired — the first ones fired," he said.

Schoeneck said that most school dropouts can be recognized as early as the second and third grades. They are not necessarily low IQ children, he said. He pointed out the value of speech therapy, special classes for slow learners, the importance of hearing and sight tests, and the value of visiting teachers and the experimental "challenge classes" where pupils procede from grade to grade at their own rate of progress.

Two-thirds of the parents of drop - outs, in one survey, felt it would in no way affect their children, Schoeneck said. "Unless we get everyone concerned, it makes solving the 'drop out' problem more difficult."

He asked the P-TA to consider getting their own statistics on "drop outs." Principal Frank Chuchek said that the 3.9 per cent drop out rate at Appomattox High is considerably lower than most high schools, and that all "drop outs" are investigated and attempts made to have those boys and girls remain in school.

Slides Shown On Local Scenes

"Physicians don't know what causes hepatitis," G. A. Pisenberger, county sanitarian told the Jr. Woman's Club at their February meeting, but we can show you some of the sections of Appomattox where the hepatitis outbreak started." He referred to the 1962-63 hepatitis rate for this county, which reached an all-time high in county history.

In a series of colored slides Pitsenberger showed homes in and around town with poor sanitation. In particular, he said, there are homes with septic tanks or outdoor privies to close to the water supply. Others are using a "chain and bucket" dug well with ground water seapage. The Health Department does have jurisdiction over sewage disposal and must issue permits for any changes in a sewage system, Pitsenberger said, but does not have jurisdiction over water supplies. However, he added, individuals may always call on the local Health Department for advice or assistance in drilling a well or making any changes in water supply.

"There is a need for education," Pitsenberger told the club. "Wash water needs to be disposed of properly, not thrown out the door where individuals can track through it, possibly carrying germs and viruses all around town.

Many of the unsanitary situations pictured have been corrected, Pitsenberger said. He cited as examples the garbage collection vehicle purchased by Appomattox, the sanitary landfill operation and garbage burning operation at the Town-County dump, plus the fact that land owners have torn down old houses and that others have built more sanitary outdoor privies. New home builders and others are calling up the Health Department for advice, Pitsenberger said.

Dramatics Club Orders 2 Plays

The officers and committee chairmen of the Dramatics Club of Appomattox High School met with their sponsors, Mrs. Spencer and Mr. Hall, to discuss some new business. The club decided to order three plays, a comedy, a mystery, and a drama. However, only two were available— "Everything Nice" and "Elizabeth." The club plans to start working on these plays for the Play Festival in March.
